

Opinion

The logo for Galion Inquirer features the word "Galion" in a stylized, serif font above a horizontal line. Below the line, the word "INQUIRER" is written in a large, bold, serif font. The entire logo is set against a background of a stylized, textured landscape.

Established September 29, 1877

VICKI TAYLOR • Publisher

CYNTHIA SHROYER • Editor

Letters to the editor

Growing up in Galion, I lived in a community where the "movers and shakers" were motivated by the best interests of the entire community. If it was good for Galion, then it certainly would be good for them.

I have felt for some time now that Galion had lost its heart, and now I'm afraid, Galion has lost its soul.

There are a few individuals who wanted to see the old high school building torn down who have resorted to intimidation to run roughshod over those who would dare hope to see something good happen for Galion, because it may infringe on their own private base of power that says that only what they want and what is in their own private best interest is the only thing that has any merit. The interests and concerns of the majority of the community be damned — "What's good for me is all that matters."

I certainly hope that the entire community of Galion will keep this in mind when those occasions arise where our voice can and will be heard no matter how much it rubs those self-annointed guardians of Galion's well being the wrong way.

Daniel A. Derfler
238 Sherman St.